Course Description. How can we adequately represent the Vietnam War, one of the most complex, controversial, and traumatic events in American history? For every story we tell, for every voice we hear, are there not many other stories forgotten and voices silenced? This course approaches these questions through consideration of both cinematic and literary texts. We will study these forms together not to prove one “better” than the other, but to enhance our understanding of the difficulties associated with representing an event that refuses to pass easily into “history.” How does Vietnam literature depend on cinematic conventions? How do Vietnam films draw on literary techniques? How do these forms, alone and together, respond to the challenges of representing the Vietnam War? Demanding, critically complex readings in film theory and film history will open up our discussion of such questions, and students will pose (and answer) questions of their own in essays and weekly journals.

The course is divided into two interrelated halves: the first examines key films released during some of the most turbulent years of the Vietnam War (1964-1972) that tend to refer to the conflict through indirect means, while the second concentrates on films produced after the war that tend to address the conflict explicitly. Again, the point is not to prove either “direct” or “indirect” representations of the war as somehow superior, but to analyze different strategies of representation and their relation to shifting historical contexts.

Prerequisites. Students must have already taken Film Analysis (ENGLIT 0530) before enrolling in this course. An expert knowledge of the textbook Film Art: An Introduction by David Bordwell and Kristin Thompson will be assumed, as this is an upper-level course in film studies. Students must review this text carefully BEFORE the course begins, as they will be required to speak and write about the interaction between film technique (mise-en-scene, cinematography, editing, sound) and film narrative using the technical vocabulary presented in Film Art. Other recommended textbooks for review of basic film studies terms include The Film Experience: An Introduction by Timothy Corrigan and Patricia White and A Short Guide to Writing About Film by Timothy Corrigan. All of these titles are available at the University of Pittsburgh Book Center and on Hillman reserve.

Course Requirements. Grades will be determined through evaluation of the following (percentages are rough, not exact): weekly journal entries (20%); a mid-term essay (20%); a final essay (40%); and attendance/class participation (20%). Because your grade depends heavily on a number of different factors, passing the course requires that you MUST: attend all lectures and screenings; have all reading assignments and journals completed before that week’s class; participate actively by raising questions and observations during class; and turn in all assignments by the deadlines specified in the course schedule, as NO late assignments will be accepted. Come to each class prepared with written questions/comments to speak about based on your weekly journal entry. Journal entries are due each week, must be at least one single-spaced, typed page each, and must answer the following questions in a format that emphasizes connections between the questions: What are the main points of this week’s readings? How would you relate your reflections to this week’s unit title on the syllabus? How do this week’s readings cause you to reflect upon previous films/readings/discussions in the course?

Arriving late or leaving class early counts as an absence, and more than TWO unexcused absences may result in automatic failure of the course. No plagiarism or academic dishonesty of any kind will be tolerated – any such activity may result in expulsion. If you have a disability for which you are or may be requesting an accommodation, you are encouraged to contact both your instructor and Disability Resources and Services, 216 William Pitt Union, 412-648-7890/412-383-7355 (TTY), as early as possible in the term. DRS will verify your disability and determine reasonable accommodations for this course.
